Since early 1990s India has experienced unprecedented high growth and yet, most indices about the economic well being of the majority of our citizens indicate they are no better off. The economy is doing well but not the people! This talk would explain without obscure economic jargon why this is happening. This understanding is essential for all concerned citizens who would collectively decide the future course of our economic social and political development.

Amit Bhaduri is a distinguished economic theorist renowned for his compelling ideas and analysis. He has been a consistent critic of mainstream neoclassical economic theory. He has made valuable contributions in several important fields including capital and growth theory, Keynesian and Post-Keynesian macroeconomics and development economics. He is currently internationally selected professor in Pavia University, Italy and visiting professor in the Council for Social Development, New Delhi.
